A balanced school calendar is one in which the typical summer vacation of twelve weeks is reduced to six or seven weeks, with additional breaks of two weeks or longer given in the fall, winter and spring, as well as the usual public holidays. Students would continue to have the same 180 legislatively mandated instructional days in the year, but the calendar will more evenly distribute these days across 10 or 11 months instead of the more typical nine months of the traditional school calendar. The goal of a balanced calendar is to limit academic regression that traditionally occurs during the long summer vacation.
